Nobody claims a boy born with the Blood sygl.

Bal Norheart lost his left hand for it before he could crawl. No sygl, no school. That was the rule.

Then the sealed temple behind his orphanage flickers. Bal flies a bedside rug through a roof that isn't there, and finds Amelia: the Vampire Goddess, locked away by the other gods for three thousand years and furious to learn the world calls her a myth.

One drink of her blood, and Bal has a hand again. One binding vow, and the goddess is his familiar. She walks out the front door beside him, straight into the Heir's School of Magykal Artes and the empty throne the gods kept for her.

Now Bal is the school's only Blood student, the High Priest of a goddess everyone fears, and the one mage alive who can change a person's sygl. He can do it only if they want it. Viridia, the storm-haired heir of the god Raizen, and Lora, the shy rapier prodigy, are starting to want a great many things.

And the god Raizen does not share what is his.

The gods play with their followers like toys. Amelia has a better idea: play their game, and break their toys.

Closed-door romance. All romantic leads are 18+.

SYGL

SØREN STROMBERG

They locked her away for three thousand years. Now she's free.

Bal Norheart was born with the Blood sygl, the one mark nobody wants, and lost his left hand for it before he could crawl. No sygl means no magic school.

Then the sealed temple behind his orphanage flickers, and Bal finds Amelia: originator of the Blood, betrayed by the other gods, and outraged to learn the world now calls her a myth. One drink of her blood regrows his hand. One vow makes the goddess his familiar.

Together they walk into the Heir's School of Magykal Artes, where being the only Blood student is dangerous, and where two very different girls are about to change everything.

When the gods' war comes for the people Bal loves, he has to decide what kind of High Priest he will be.

A warm new adult fantasy of found family, forbidden magic and a love big enough for four.
